

Right Corporate Wrongs

The Companies Act (formerly the Companies Bill)

An update for supporters on the outcome

(November 2006)

Overview

The Companies Bill has concluded its passage through Parliament and has now become law (as the Companies Act 2006) having received Royal Assent (approval by the Queen) on 8 November. Thanks to your campaigning, we have been able to achieve some important improvements to UK company law.

The following outlines the changes your campaigning has helped to make and what these will mean for the operation of British business both here and abroad. Also detailed are some of the changes that are still needed to make British business work better for people and the planet. In 2007 and beyond, CORE and the Trade Justice Movement will continue the campaign to right corporate wrongs.

What have we been demanding?

The Companies Act was the biggest shake up of UK company law for 150 years and an unprecedented opportunity to make laws to help stop big British business profiting at the expense of people and the environment. CORE and the Trade Justice Movement demanded improvements to company law so that:

- Companies are legally required to report on their social and environmental impacts
- Directors are legally obliged to minimise any damage their company does to local communities and the environment
- People overseas who are harmed by the activities of a UK company are able to take action against them in a UK court

What have we achieved?

Real Improvements to UK company law

Thanks to your campaigning, we achieved some significant improvements to the legislation during its passage through Parliament over the course of the past year. The following improvements were made as a result of your emails, letters and visits to MPs:

1. Stronger social and environmental reporting requirements

- Thanks to over 100,000 UK voters contacting their MP in 2006 through emails, postcards, letters and local lobbying, the Government strengthened the requirements in the legislation on social and environmental reporting.
- More progress was made as the pressure group Compass joined our calls for stronger reporting requirements in June. Compass MPs Jon Trickett MP and Colin Burgon MP tabled amendments which gained cross-party support, including from over 50 Labour MPs as well as the Liberal Democrat and Scottish Nationalist Party Trade & Industry front bench teams.
- The resulting Companies Act 2006 now requires that the 1300 or so publicly-listed companies report on the following issues where they are necessary to understanding the company's business:
 - I. Environmental matters (including the impact of the company's business on the environment)
 - II. The company's employees
 - III. Social and community issues
 - IV. Risks down company supply chains
- Unfortunately, some big business interest groups lobbied against our call for widening the application of the reporting requirements to a much larger number of companies and for legal standards on how they should report on these issues. The Government sided with these groups on these matters.

- However, in response to public pressure, the Government has promised to review the system of reporting standards within two years, and to bring forward stricter legal standards if the system is not working.

2. Directors' Duties on Environmental and Social Matters

Thanks to your campaigning, the directors of UK companies now have a duty not only to maximise profits but also to consider the impacts of their business operations on the community and the environment. This is the first time that the words 'community' and 'environment' have been mentioned in UK company law in this way, and CORE and The Trade Justice Movement are not aware of any other country in the world that demands in written law, this kind of responsibility from company directors. However, it is hard to know until this legislation is implemented what the exact extent of its practical implications will be.

Pressure to make companies behave more responsibly also meant that the Government put in place a link between the reporting requirements and the directors' duties in the Companies Act, making it clearer that the reports must show how directors are performing in their duties, including those on environmental and social issues. This brings decision-making on these matters to the heart of the boardroom.

The Government also added a new provision so that the law now recognises that some companies can be run for purposes other than to make profits. In addition, the Government have committed to publishing advice on how directors' should interpret their duties, helping them understand exactly how they should take social and environmental matters into consideration.

Awareness about corporate wrongs

Your campaigning has brought about a major increase in awareness about the abuses committed by British companies overseas and the need for laws to prevent these, laying the groundwork for more progress in the future.

- Parliamentary Petition: Over 225 MPs (over one-third of all MPs) signed Early Day Motion 697 – the Parliamentary petition tabled by Sarah McCarthy-Fry MP supporting our proposed amendments.
- Debates: Our concerns about the social and environmental provisions dominated all the debates in Parliament on the Bill and have been represented by MPs across the political spectrum.

"I had more letters from constituents about trade justice and the Companies Bill than any other issue since I became an MP."

Ed Balls MP, Economic Secretary to the Treasury

"I believe that the rights of companies should be counterbalanced by meaningful and effective responsibilities including responsibility for the environmental, social and economic impacts of their business. I agree that the law should be changed to ensure that this is realised. I received a staggering number of letters from constituents sharing concerns and contacted the Minister to urge her to amend the Companies Bill."

Diane Abbott MP, Hackney North and Stoke Newington

Coverage in the media

Towards the end of the legislation's passage through Parliament, the story broke through in the media and gave the coalitions and member organisations a new level of coverage in radio and print news. There were regular stories in The Guardian and Financial Times towards the end of the campaign, along with broadcast interviews with coalition members on BBC News 24, Radio 5, Radio 4's Today programme and the World Service.

The work done by CORE and the Trade Justice Movement positioned the coalitions as key voices in debates around corporate accountability, which is a great platform for future campaigning. Indeed, the FT reported that "business had been comprehensively outmanoeuvred by environmental and corporate responsibility campaigners, in a stunning lobbying victory" (Financial Times, 25 October 2006).

There was some impressive coverage including:

- Polly Toynbee's article in The Guardian: <http://business.guardian.co.uk/story/0,,1932620,00.html>
- John Battle MP's article on rights of redress for affected communities: <http://business.guardian.co.uk/story/0,,1926631,00.html>
- ActionAid's full page celebrity advert in the Guardian asking MPs to back our amendments

Inspiring New Campaigns Around the World

This groundbreaking campaign has inspired coalitions in other countries to press for changes in their laws to make companies more accountable.

Across Europe and around the world there has been a strong interest in our campaign and it has been referenced in international media from the New York Times to national papers in Singapore and Saudi Arabia.

CORE and the Trade Justice Movement have received enquiries from a diverse range of academics, thinkers, civil society groups and others all over the world who have been closely following the campaign.

What next?

CORE and the Trade Justice Movement are already gearing up for future campaigning in 2007 and beyond so the right measures are put in place that will ensure companies are made accountable for their impact on people and planet. This will include how the Companies Act 2006 works in practice and pushing for rights of redress for communities negatively impacted by UK companies operating overseas, especially in poor countries. The unprecedented UK alliance to right corporate wrongs will also be working with allies across the world for international regulation of corporations at a European and global level.

Our supporters in Parliament

This progress could not have been made without supportive MPs in Parliament, many of whom became interested in the Bill because of your lobbying and then went on to work very hard to get the improvements to the Bill. MPs and Peers who have actively supported our campaign include:
